

I think the FCC should stay out of regulating VoIP phones. The recent proposal to identify every wireless access point in the country is a perfect example of why. VoIP is not the same as traditional wired phone service and shouldn't be treated the same. If someone wants to ensure that they will always have immediate access to the right 911 service then they can keep a landline phone at home and pay the associated fees and taxes. However, if someone like me is not worried about 911 access why should i have to pay for it?
